Abstract:

'Sovereignty' is once again a crucial feature in both the academic and public debate, due to the crisis of the liberal international order, but also – and increasingly – as a response to challenges coming from economic and technological domains, which are reshaping the way governments perceive international security threats and adjust related policies. In this context, the present project focuses on the politics and policy of the national interest in contemporary Europe. More specifically, our aim is to investigate the how international threats to the security of national assets are framed by policymakers and embodied into regulative responses in the domain of critical infrastructure and supply chains (CISC).
